Book Project: *Policing Beliefs Broadly, the book seeks to understand how it is that Americans of different racial, economic, social and political backgrounds have come to hold dramatic divergent views of justice in America. Chapter 1 explains why these divergent beliefs crucial to understanding and addressing the problems of criminal justice in the U.S. Chapter 2, situates standard explanations of racial gaps in criminal justice attitudes within a more general model of public opinion, clarifying the process through which gaps emerge and the conditions in which they will change. Chapter 3 consider the particular role of experiences with criminal justice play in shaping political attitudes and behavior combining novel analysis of survey and administrative data. Chapter 4 examines the extent to which technology has made the kinds experiential information that form the foundation of criminal justices beliefs available to much larger audiences, combining content analysis of cable and network news that document change with survey experiments that examine its effects. Chapter 5 argues the effect of such information depends not just on how it is received and but who it actually reaches, and shows how experimental methods can be adapted to study these questions. Chapter 6 applies the insights of Chapter 5 to specific debates surrounding reforms to the police, courts, and prisons and shows how support for such reforms depends both the message and messenger. Chapter 7 concludes by summarizing the theoretical and practical contributions of the book.
